Thursday evening the camp was beset with a crowd of pale ghost-like figures, as the guests of Miss Hazel Martin. They swarmed the station and seemed to take great delight in frightening the passengers on the south bound train, to join their ranks. An old couple, evidently not used to the wild and woolly kind were seen making desperate attempts to crawl under the seats and out of the window in one last effort to escape. The train having thoughtlessly moved on, in spite of their childish pranks. They meandered over the hills to a bon fire by which they warmed their chilled bones. After they had partaken of dainty refreshments in a most healthy and unghostly manner, they suddenly took human forms and danced until the wee sma' hours.
